A look at the best U.S. airport chow so you eat well while you travel.

Airport dining gets a bad rap for being pricey, bland or both. But it doesn't have to be that way. Some eateries now offer first-rate chow — you just need to know where to go.

Fortune went on a quest to find the best airport restaurants in America (just in time for the busy holiday travel season). We reached out to award-winning food writers, phoned restaurants and crawled reviews. The result: a nationwide list, so travelers never have to eat greasy pizza or shrink-wrapped pretzels again.

At One Flew South, modern aesthetic marries rustic decor. The eatery's floor and ceiling were fashioned with local pine wood, while a photo-realistic mural of the Georgia forest serves as the backdrop for diners peer at while they nosh. The chow itself weds sushi and southern food. So expect items like cornmeal dusted trout alongside spicy tuna rolls or seaweed salad with soy egg, drizzled with sesame vinaigrette. Meanwhile, wine connoisseurs will appreciate the eatery's large, international wine collection, with prices that start low ($8 for a glass for Riesling) and top off at $350 for a bottle of Cabernet Sauvignon from Napa.

Average meal price: $25
