Fried chicken may not be the best option for our waistslines, but when your tastes buds are crying tears of joy (read: you're drooling), calorie intake is just a brief and fleeting afterthought.

That's why it's important to find comfort food everywhere, especially outside of typical Southern eatery destinations.

We've partnered with Buick to bring you the best Southern restaurants you won't find south of the Mason-Dixon line (and one that you will) to keep your chewing muscles strong, your stomachs full and your emotional state extremely satisfied.

Airports are typically known for being a hub of flight delays, lost luggage claims and disgruntled passengers -- essentially, chaos. However, the Hartsfield-Jackson Atlanta International Airport is home to something much sweeter: exceptionally great Southern cuisine. One Flew South, the airport's first-ever upscale dining experience, has a menu stocked with ingredients from regional producers and a brilliant to-go menu that allows guests in a time crunch to enjoy their meal. Schedule your next trip with a layover in Atlanta and treat yourself to a thyme-roasted pork belly or 'OFS' dirty south: an open-faced meatloaf sandwich with pimento cheese, sauteed spinach, bacon, BBQ sauce and a fried egg.
